Hexagonal bubbles represent computer systems. computer. Bubbles represent discreet instruments. This type of bubble is also used to define the function of final control elements such as valves. This is done with a call line pointing to the symbol for the control element. The letters and no. Within the bubble are described below. All these types of bubbles are defined by a horizontal line, lines or missing. These lines define where the instrument is located and is or is not accessible to the operator. No line means that the device and/or its exhibition is physically located in the field and if it has a display, it is only locally legally. A only line means that the screen is located on a main control panel or a video display and is usually accessible to the operator. A DASHED line means the display is not usually accessible to the operator. A double line doubles means that the display is located on a second or local control panel that usually is accessible to the operator a double dashed line means that the display is located on a secondary control panel and no e © usually accessible to the operator. Within the form of letters and no. Used to designate the property being measured (such as flow, pressure, temperature or not) and the function performed with this measurement. Topic Functions are: exhibition, registration, transmission and control. Below are some samples, along with a grain of letters and what they represent for the most common instrument components. These instruments are identified by five letters: (2 mother) 1st letter is the property to be measured: f = flow rate, p = pressure, t = temperature, l = no. Modifier: D = Differential, F = Relationship.
